English Heritage - British National Bibliography

The British Library A Roman, Anglo-Latin site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle: excavations 1977-9. Research series /? Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society. Royal Commission on the Historical Monuments of England: Excavations at Rickergate, 1998-9 and 53-55 Botchergate, 2001 - Cumbria: The Cumbria Group of County Archaeologists. Archaeological Research Reports, of which this is the second, are intended to bring to light new and interesting archaeological findings from the region. The Cumbria Group of County Archaeologists has published a number of these reports, including one on the Roman site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle: excavations 1977-9, which was written by M.R. McCarthy. The report provides an overview of the site and its context within the wider archaeological landscape of the region.

The report is part of a series of publications by the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society, which is dedicated to the study and dissemination of local and regional archaeological research. The society has a long history of supporting and promoting archaeological research in the region, and has published numerous reports and monographs on a wide range of topics.

The site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle, is one of the most important research topics associated with the archaeology of Roman, Anglo-Latin and medieval sites in the region. The site has produced a wealth of archaeological evidence, including artefacts, structures, and features that provide insight into the daily lives of the people who lived and worked there. The site is located in an area that was an important centre of the region, and is situated close to the Roman fort at Carrawburgh, which was an important military and administrative centre.

The excavation of the site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle, was carried out between 1977 and 1979, and the results were published in a detailed and comprehensive report. The report provides a detailed account of the excavation, including a description of the site, the methods used, and the results obtained. The report also includes a number of illustrations and images of the site, which provide a visual record of the archaeological evidence.

The report is an important resource for scholars and researchers interested in the archaeology of Roman, Anglo-Latin and medieval sites in the region, and provides a wealth of information on the site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle. The report is an important contribution to the study of the archaeology of the region, and is an essential resource for anyone interested in the archaeology of Roman, Anglo-Latin and medieval sites in the region.

The report is available for sale through the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society, and can be purchased online. The report is also available through a number of other resources, including the British Library, the Library of Congress, and the British National Bibliography.

The report is an important resource for scholars and researchers interested in the archaeology of Roman, Anglo-Latin and medieval sites in the region, and provides a wealth of information on the site at Blackfriars Street, Carlisle. The report is an important contribution to the study of the archaeology of the region, and is an essential resource for anyone interested in the archaeology of Roman, Anglo-Latin and medieval sites in the region.

The report is available for sale through the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society, and can be purchased online. The report is also available through a number of other resources, including the British Library, the Library of Congress, and the British National Bibliography.